CRITIC’S PICK

‘The African Desperate’ Review: Double Speak

Martine Syms’s whip-smart satire brings the invisible, everyday negotiations of a Black artist to startlingly visual life.

Diamond Stingily in “The African Desperate.” Mubi

By Devika Girish
Sept. 15, 2022
Martine Syms’s debut feature derives its title from a Freudian slip. In the opening scene, as Palace (Diamond Stingily), a sculptor at an upstate New York art school, describes her thesis project to an all-white faculty panel, she mispronounces “African diaspora” as “African desperate.” It sounds nonsensical, but no one bats an eye, and the professors continue with their jargon-riddled commentary. This is the art world, a place as open to absurdity as it is closed to diversity. Here, people say made-up terms with grave conviction yet are incredulous that a Black woman like Palace has made it to the Venice Biennale.

Drawn from Syms’s own experiences as a visual artist, “The African Desperate” is less an art-school parody as it is a portrait of existential incongruity, where contempt mingles with deep affection. After being anointed a Master of Fine Arts, a frustrated Palace is ready to pack up and leave, but she stays on for 24 final hours of debauchery, coaxed by friends, drugs and potential lovers.
As Palace stumbles through a series of neon-hued encounters, ranging in tone from slapstick to dark comedy, Syms brings the invisible, everyday negotiations of a Black artist to startlingly visual life with layers of images and sounds. When a white classmate says she’s never heard of the Jamaican writer Sylvia Wynter, Palace doesn’t react, but a meme flashes briefly on-screen with the caption: “What if I told you there were Black theorists?”

There’s an echo of Luis Buñuel’s “The Exterminating Angel” in “The African Desperate,” though Palace’s stuckness in her off-putting milieu is less surreal than tragically banal. As alienating as art school might be, it’s also a refuge for our eccentric, orange-haired heroine.

The African Desperate
Not rated. Running time: 1 hour 37 minutes. In theaters.

The Many Lives of Martine Syms
Sept. 2, 2022

The African Desperate ✓ NYT Critic’s Pick

When you purchase a ticket for an independently reviewed film through our site, we earn an affiliate commission.

Director Martine Syms

Writers Rocket Caleshu, Martine Syms

Stars Diamond Stingily, Dillon Egyes, Brent David Freaney, Erin Leland, Ruby McCollister

Running Time 1h 37m

Genre Drama